UUSC partners with over 75 grassroots organizations on the front lines of critical human rights issues. Most of our partners have small staff sizes, and many are just getting started – but all make a big difference. This year’s theme – Small Change Is Big Change – celebrates the bravery, innovation, and reach of UUSC’s grassroots partners. With your support, UUSC and our partners are not only responding to extraordinary challenges of today, we are also addressing root causes of injustice and building capacity to respond to future challenges.

The Unitarian Universalist Service Committee (UUSC) is a 77-year-old human rights organization that advances human rights in three core areas: Rights at Risk, Environmental Justice & Climate Action, and Economic Justice. Powered by grassroots collaboration, UUSC partners with innovative, locally-led organizations around the U.S. and the globe to support communities responding to natural disaster, humanitarian crisis, and climate change displacement, and those working to build sustainable livelihoods.

I. Opening Words

A poem by Marshall Islands writer Kathy Jetñil-Kijiner, written to her daughter, and read at the Opening Ceremony of the UN Climate Summit in 2014:

dear matafele peinam,
they say you, your daughter and your granddaughter, too will wander rootless with only a passport to call home

dear matafele peinam,
don't cry
mommy promises you [...]
no one's drowning, baby
no one's moving no one's losing their homeland
no one's gonna become a climate change refugee

or should i say
no one else
to the carteret islanders of papua new guinea
and to the taro islanders of the solomon islands
i take this moment
to apologize to you
we are drawing the line here because baby we are going to fight

your mommy daddy
bubu jimma your country and president too
we will all fight

II. Guest at Your Table Sermon: “Small Change is Big Change”

Written by By Joshua Leach, Associate for Programs, Research and Advocacy, UUSC

On July 13, 2017, UUSC staff members gathered in front of the Burlington, Massachusetts field office of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). UUSC was invited there by Massachusetts Jobs with Justice to support an undocumented local resident and father of two, Francisco Rodriguez, as he prepared for his ICE appointment. This was the meeting that would determine whether he would be allowed to stay in this country, where his children were born and where he had worked for ten years, or whether he would be detained and deported. When the moment came for him to enter the field office, these and other supporters began singing songs of solidarity and faith. “Courage, my friend,” went one, “You do not walk alone.”

Francisco did not come back through the door he had entered. Within the hour, he had been taken into a black van and driven out of the back side of the office to a detention center, as his supporters tried and failed to block the exit. As of September 15, he had not yet been released. During these more than two months in detention, his wife gave birth to their third child, meaning that he was not able to be with his family when his son came into the world.

Political rhetoric and media narratives have stigmatized families like Francisco’s as “dangerous”; in reality, Francisco came to the U.S. to escape danger. The Northern triangle countries of Guatemala, Honduras, and El Salvador, Francisco’s home country, suffer from rates of violence comparable to active war zones. Indeed, Francisco left El Salvador after witnessing the murder of his coworker.

Francisco Rodriguez is only one among thousands who have escaped violence and are now facing an escalating assault on immigrant and refugee communities. The U.S. administration’s “travel ban” is notorious. Less well known – and less checked by the judicial system – is what recently happened to the Central American families who were imprisoned in Berks detention facility for as long as 18 months without ever receiving a proper asylum screening, before being deported last spring to the hands of their persecutors; or the hundreds of Central American parents whom Immigration and Customs Enforcement arrested this summer on so-called “human trafficking” charges. Their only “crime” had been to do what any loving parents would in their position – they hired people to bring their children to safety. Many of these children would have fallen victims to gangs, sex traffickers, and corrupt state actors if their parents had not paid someone to bring them across the border.

Unfortunately, these realities – seeking refuge and being sent back into danger, being seen as a danger rather than in danger, being criminalized and denied basic support – can be seen throughout history and around the world.

In Burma (also known as Myanmar), for example, power is divided between an entrenched military regime with a long and bloody history of human rights violations on the one hand; and on the other, a nominally civilian government is unwilling to speak out against the military's actions for fear of losing its tenuous hold on the state. As a result, persecution is again breaking out against the ethnic Rohingya – a stateless Muslim minority who are denied citizenship in their home country and are confined within Burma's Rakhine state inside Internally Displaced Persons camps strikingly similar to concentration camps. Whenever violence erupts between government forces and Rohingya militants, it is the Rohingya community as a whole that is blamed in the aftermath. International aid and contact with the outside world are routinely denied to a population already on the brink of starving, and countries that could help are instead closing their doors.

In Alaska and the South Pacific, indigenous communities are suffering a different type of displacement as climate change drives them from their homes. This summer, UUSC staff members stood in the islands of the South Pacific, meeting with indigenous communities who were still struggling to convince international agencies of the reality of climate change-induced displacement, even as many of their own people had already been forced to relocate from their ancestral homelands and to plan for irrevocable changes in their way of life.

These injustices can seem disparate and far removed from one another, but they are in fact deeply intertwined. When the Hindu nationalist government of India threatens Rohingya refugees with mass round-ups and deportation, it is mirroring a U.S. administration that creates and justifies nativist and anti-Muslim policies. When the Australian government interdicts Rohingya refugees and tows them to off-shore detention centers on Nauru and Manus Island, it has powerful company in a U.S. government that – over the past two administrations – has funded border police in Mexico and Central America to similarly prevent people from seeking asylum.

When Donald Trump promotes Islamophobic rhetoric, he probably isn't thinking of the Rohingya. But by his actions, he contributes to a world where governments think they can violate the rights of Muslims with impunity – a world where Muslim lives matter less. Likewise, to vote for nativist and xenophobic policies is not necessarily to intend the deportation of Francisco Rodriguez or of the mothers and children in Berks detention center. But these are the reverberations of that choice nonetheless.

Beyond the importance of offering refuge to those in need of protection, regardless of context, the United States has a particular historical responsibility where people like Francisco and the Berks families are concerned. By its actions and policies, the U.S. has actually contributed to the conditions currently leading thousands to flee from Central America. Through support of authoritarian regimes in the 1980s, including regimes responsible for mass killings of indigenous peoples and other grotesque human rights abuses, the U.S. contributed toward the instability and powerful organized crime networks that currently control large portions of Central America.

When we begin to realize the connections between all these injustices, it can seem overwhelming. We may feel as though we are confronted with a complex of evil too big and too powerful to resist – and we may feel too small to do anything about it. The truth, however, is that no one designed this complex. No one person controls it. Largescale, intertwined global injustices are made up of many smaller acts of selfishness, of callousness, and of cruelty that have ripple effects far beyond themselves – often in ways unforeseen by the one who perpetrates them.

The Rohingya refugees of Burma are connected to their refugee siblings in the Americas, and to people displaced by climate change. They are suffering the consequences of mindsets and policies that write off entire groups of at-risk people as “not my problem,” or that stigmatize and persecute whole communities in the name of “fighting terrorism” or “national unity.” Each related piece of rhetoric, policy, or behavior, however small, contributes toward a massive global phenomenon of the world’s most vulnerable people receiving blame, profiling, or a blind eye. It can be daunting to realize the outsized importance that actions can have. But it also points us to the path beyond despair. Small choices of selfishness can yield unanticipated evils, but so too, small sacrifices for other lives and for generations not yet born are larger than themselves.

This capacity of small efforts to, all together, build largescale systemic change – this is the heart of the Unitarian Universalist Service Committee’s work. This can be seen in UUSC’s partners leveraging small amounts of resources and tiny staff sizes to support asylum-seekers and migrants in U.S. detention, support their legal rights, and push for policy change. It is visible in our partners supporting migration with dignity and community advocacy for people displaced by climate change – in youth building lasting connections between their home islands and the islands to which they are moving. And it is visible to UUSC partners in Burma training a new generation of peacebuilders and change makers – currently young adults barred from formal higher education – who are going to have an impact beyond themselves and in years to come.

In addition to this, UUSC witnesses at least one act of love in its work for every act of cold indifference. That love is visible in the people who gathered in front of the Burlington ICE office to sing courage to Francisco. It is visible in the parents who risk criminal charges and deportation as so-called “human traffickers” for the sake of bringing their kids to safety. It is visible in all those millions of people who migrate around the globe each year to send money home to their families and provide a better future. It is visible in the ethnic Burmese who risk death or imprisonment by their own security forces to bring life-saving medical supplies to Rohingya IDP camps.

The struggle for human rights is very often a fight of this sort – a fight not for the present, but for the future, for one’s children and their children. The timeline of human rights is not compressed. The changes we wish to see in the world seldom bear fruit overnight. The earliest abolitionists could not have acted from the outset with any sure or obvious chance of success. When Frederick Douglass died in 1895, he left behind him a country where the collapse of Reconstruction and the rise of Chinese Exclusion Acts had seemingly made a ruin of his efforts to achieve racial equality for Black and Asian people in the U.S. But he did not fight for those things because he expected to win in his lifetime. He fought for lives to come. He fought because, in the fullness of time, our actions have consequences that outlast our individual selves. “[T]rue greatness wears an invisible cloak,” the novelist Samuel Butler once wrote. It means being willing to “live in the lives of those who are yet unborn.” Or, to cite words with which UUs are intimately familiar – the words of Theodore Parker that Martin Luther King Jr. so famously cited: “The Moral Arc of the Universe is long – but I am sure it bends toward justice.”

III. Moment for All Ages: Aung Kyaw Moe, Making Big Change in Burma

Today's story is a sad one about how some people are treated badly because of their religious beliefs and, it's also about hope and how one person is finding a way to make big change.

Once there was a little boy named Aung Kyaw Moe (ANG K-YAW MOE). He lived in a place called Burma, a country all the way on the other side of the world from us. The part of Burma where Aung Kyaw Moe grew up is called the Rakhine State (it's in the north). From the time Aung Kyaw Moe was a small boy, he could see that not everyone was treated the same in his country. Sometimes things were really unfair, especially for a group of people called the Rohingya. The Rohingya were treated differently because their language and religion were different from the rest. The children couldn't go to school, people were mean to them, and the government didn't count them as citizens. This means they don't get to vote or decide anything about their country, and it means they don't get help when bad things happen, like floods.

When Aung Kyaw Moe grew up he left Burma for a long time, and he learned a lot about how to work for more fairness in the world. Aung Kyaw Moe came back to Burma because he saw that all the ways the Rohingya were treated unfairly when he was a little kid were still true today – in fact, recently, things had gotten even worse. Some people even started blaming the Rohingya for all the other bad things that are happening in their country.

And then, just a few months ago, the police and the army told the Rohingya people they had to move out of their homes and leave their country. Most of them were so scared of being hurt that they had to go, leaving everything behind – their houses and food and toys and everything. The army even burned up their homes and villages. So now a lot of the Rohingya have to live a really long way from their homes, in big tents that are crowded with too many people.

Aung Kyaw Moe came back to Burma because he wants to help people to speak up and stand up for their rights, so they can be treated just the same as everyone else. He went back to the area where he grew up, in the Rakhine state, and he started to meet with lots of young people. He started an organization called the Center for Social Integrity (CSI), to teach young people ways they can speak up for themselves, and for other people in their communities. Our very own faith, Unitarian Universalism, is helping Aung Kyaw Moe, because the Unitarian Universalist Service Committee is giving the organization some money and spreading the word about what they're doing. We're doing this even though Aung Kyaw Moe is all the way on the other side of the world, because we believe everyone has a right to be treated fairly.

There are lots of things that make the work he is doing hard, but Aung Kyaw Moe feels hopeful that when young people learn more about fairness and how to get along with all our differences, it helps everyone learn that together we are stronger and braver and happier. Aung Kyaw Moe says, "The future belongs to youth, and they should shape what they think is the best for them." When we save up some of our money and put it in our GAYT boxes each day, it doesn't look like very much even after a whole month. But when we put it together with the money everyone else in the church gives, and then put THAT together with money from lots of other churches, it helps UUSC make a really big difference in places like Burma.

IV. Closing Words

Our forces were slight. Our goal
Lay far in the distance
It was clearly visible, though I myself
Was unlikely to reach it.
So passed my time
Which had been given to me on earth.

- Bertolt Brecht, "To Those Born Later"

Translation by John Willett, Ralph Manheim & Erich Fried.

Say not the struggle naught availeth
The labour and the wounds are vain,[...]

For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main.

And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light;
In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly!
But westward, look, the land is bright!

- Arthur Hugh Clough, Unitarian poet
